"We got on the court, ready to play ball, and the guy with the dreads walks in the middle of court, looks at Marc, and said, 'You flexin?'" "Marc doesn't say anything. Then he looks at me and says, 'You flexin', big man? You flexin?'" I said, 'We're just trying to ball, and you acting like you own this park or something.'

"We didn't think the course of action would be what happened. My little brother said, 'Chris, chill out. We're at they house.' I felt this dude behind me, so I chilled out. I turned to the guy behind me, to shake his hand, and he already got the gun pulled out. He said, 'F--- that,' and starts shooting.

An aspiring Central City rapper will face a prison sentence of 2 x 25 to 200 years when sentenced next week, following his conviction Wednesday (March 25) on charges of attempting to kill two men in an argument over who had the next turn to play on the public basketball court at A.L. Davis Park. An Orleans Parish jury deliberated less than three hours before returning unanimous verdicts convicting Gerard Gray, aka "Roy Da Prince," on two counts of attempted second-degree murder stemming from the shooting of two men on July 8, 2014.

NOPD Detective Kristen Krzemieniecki, tasked to the city's Multi-Agency Gang unit, told jurors that Gray was recognized by authorities as a leader of the violent street gang known to terrorize Central City. Prosecutors had Gray show jurors the bird wings tattooed on the back of his hands, and played three rap videos featuring "Da Prince of Central City" that were recorded at the park. In them, Gray spits boastful lyrics about guns and murder, and warns outsiders "We better not catch you Uptown." Assistant District Attorney Michael Trummel, one of the prosecutors, described the "Byrdgang" as "one of the most murderous gangs in town."
